You arrive at the airport with moments to spare and glide through security with no hassle, no need to disrobe. After all, why would you? You're wearing Chanel. That vision, presented during the fashion house's spring 2016 show, imagined a world that went well beyond Karl Lagerfeld's concept of travel-wear. The meticulously constructed airport set in the Grand Palais included a Chanel

Airlines check-in desk and a departure gate marked—what else?—No. 5. It was a scene that called to mind a more glamorous era of air travel, when the ease of boarding a plane was paired with genuine excitement about the journey ahead. And then there were the little things from the pilot and crew—a deck of cards, a pair of pin-on wings—tokens of gratitude that required only a smile in return. «
